Few therapists are trained or experienced helping clients who hoard.

If you cannot find a therapist on this list that will work for you, try this:

Think about what else in your life is not going well or what other ways you could benefit from therapy. It could be things like loss of a loved one, childhood trauma, depression, anxiety, ADHD, OCD, or other mental health issues. Look for a therapist for those reasons.

Research shows a connection between other issues and hoarding. A therapist is only part of a team effort to help someone who is hoarding. Consider also using a professional organizer or a support group.

Professional Organizers Page 1 of 3

Organizers work one-on-one with the homeowner to:

- (a) keep homeowner focused on the task of decluttering,
- (b) support decision-making about what to keep/not to keep,
- (c) organize what is kept,
- (d) teach new skills such as filing papers, doing laundry, etc.

The ICD “Clutter-Hoarding Scale” is used as a reference to determine the level of hoarding. For the description of each level, see ICD, you can download a copy of their brochure FREE: <https://www.challengingdisorganization.org/clutter-hoarding-scale>

In generalized language, level 1 is light clutter, level 2 is heavier clutter (or the person's belongings), levels 3, 4, and 5 are increased physical levels of piles. Higher levels of piles indicate that some areas of the home may have degraded, has damage, is unsafe, and can be dangerous for people to enter unprotected. Level 3 recommends that workers use physical protection for breathing, clothing, and shoes.

Anyone entering a level 4 or 5 home should use full body covering and breathing apparatus.
